

Iran Prepares for the Post-Ayatollah Era Interim Secular Government for Iran

With the proposal of an interim secular government advanced by David Abbasi, also known as “Siyavash Awesta.” Abbasi, a philosopher, essayist, and innovator of groundbreaking ideas, is also a historian and writer. He hosts radio and television programs in multiple languages, leaving a significant mark on contemporary history for over 50 years. He has explicitly stated that he does not seek any position within the government he is proposing.

This government, envisioned to replace the Shia clerical regime in Iran, would have the mission of rapidly organizing a national congress. The congress would draft a secular and democratic constitution aimed at uniting all Iranian people in equality while respecting the country's rich cultural and historical mosaic.

This initiative has been praised by numerous international figures. Political leaders such as President Emmanuel Macron, French senators, members of the Belgian Parliament, and the president of the Norwegian Parliament have already met with and supported members of this proposed government.

Today, many Iranians hold influential leadership roles around the world. Among them are the president of the Norwegian Parliament, ministers, lawmakers, mayors of major European cities, leaders of political parties in Germany and Sweden, and executives at global companies like Uber, Google, Twitter, and eBay. Additionally, many Iranian scientists contribute to organizations such as NASA. All these individuals, driven by a deep connection to their homeland, have expressed their readiness to assist in rebuilding Iran.
